

Dr. Christopher Simenz is currently the Associate Director for the MPH and DrPH Programs in Public Health at the Medical College of Wisconsin and an Associate Professor in the Institute for Health & Equity. He has spent the past 20 years working in collaboration with numerous school and community partners in community-engaged research, policy, and systems change focused on the social determinants of health (SDOH), public and community health, physical activity and wellness. Dr. Simenz and colleagues have created and operationalized policy and systems changes focused on equitable health improvement via physical activity for a broad range of people, from children to senior refugees. He also is heavily engaged in the application of physical activity as primary and secondary prevention to promote health.
